Youth are facing their own challenges in addition to the stresses of the pandemic, racial injustice, political unrest, and climate crisis. This series looks at the ways we can help ourselves and youth respond to difficulties and grow as a result. Participants will learn how to use a youth development framework to support students in dealing with hardship and building new skills.

Created and facilitated by leading mental health and education experts at Partnerships in Education and Resilience (PEAR) and incubated at Harvard and McLean Hospital, this workshop series was built as a response to the urgent needs of educators, youth, and their communities.

Oregon registry credit will be available (set pending).
